Sanjana bomb scare, Paris is a pretty close we bacon and country music, what more want?"

uld he want? It was an incredibly stupid he failed to answer, I was reminded of ly am. Movie characters might chase each fog or race down the stairs of burning 's for beginners. Real love amounts to th, even when you're offered the perfect rt someone's feelings. I wanted to say effect, but my hand puppets were back er. Instead, I pulled my chair a few inches silently at our little table on the square, world like two people in love.

Repeat After Me

A
though we'd discussed my upcoming visit to Winston-Salem, my sister and I didn't make exact arrangements until the eve of my arrival, when I phoned from a hotel in Salt Lake City.

"I'll be at work when you arrive," she said, "so I'm think ing I'll just leave the key under the hour ott near the ack toor."

"The what?"

"Hour ott."

I thought she had something in her mouth until I realized she was speaking in code.

"What are you, on a speakerphone at a methadone clinic? Why can't you just tell me where you put the goddam house key?"
Her voice dropped to a whisper. "I just don't know that I trust these things."

"Are you on a cell phone?"

"Of course not," she said. "This is just a regular cordless, but still, you have to be careful."

When I suggested that actually she didn't have to be careful, Lisa resumed her normal tone of voice, saying, "Really? But I heard . . . ."

My sister's the type who religiously watches the fear segments of her local Eyewitness News broadcasts, retaining nothing but the headline. She remembers that applesauce can kill you but forgets that in order to die, you have to inject it directly into your bloodstream. Pronouncements that cellphone conversations may be picked up by strangers mix with the reported rise of both home burglaries and brain tumors, meaning that as far as she's concerned, all telecommunication is potentially life-threatening. If she didn't watch it on the news, she read it in Consumer Reports or heard it thirdhand from a friend of a friend of a friend whose ear caught fire while dialing her answering machine. Everything is dangerous all of the time, and if it's not yet been pulled off the shelves, then it's certainly under investigation — so there.

"Okay," I said. "but can you tell me which hour ott? The last time I was there you had quite a few of them."

"It's ed," she told me. "Well . . . eddish."

I arrived at Lisa's house late the following afternoon, found the key beneath the flowerpot, and let myself in through the back door. A lengthy note on the floor explained how I might go about operating every appliance from television to the waffle iron, each carefully ending with the line "Remember to turn off [appliances] after use." At the bottom of page three, a postscript informed me that if the appliance in question had no washer, for instance — I should make sure it had finished its cycle and was cool to the touch before leaving.

The note reflected a growing hysteria, its subtitle "Oh-my-God-he's-going-to-be-alone-in-my-house-for-five-hours!"

She left her work number, her husband's work number, the number of the next-door neighbor, addendum number one: I don't know the woman very well, so I probably shouldn't tell her unless it was an emergency. "P.P.S. She doesn't know you're gay."

The last time I was alone at my sister's place, I had been living in a white-brick apartment complex occupied by single, middle-aged working women. This was the seventies, when we were supposed to be living in college and everyone was supposed to be living in college and everyone was supposed to be living in college. She'd planned on going to law school, but after two years in Virginia she'd returned to Florida to find a job at a wineshop. It was a normal-enough situation, one-year-old, but being a dropout was not what she'd planned for herself. Worse than that, it had destroyed her. As children we'd been assigned certain led to a whisper. "I just don’t know that I will phone?" she said. "This is just a regular cordless, be careful." and that actually she didn’t have to be careless normal tone of voice, saying, "Really? type who religiously watches the fear segeyewitness News broadcasts, retaining storyline. She remembers that applesauce didn’t that in order to die, you have to inject bloodstream. Pronouncements that cells may be picked up by strangers mix with as she’s concerned, all telecommunication-safety-threatening. If she didn’t watch it on Consumer Reports or heard it thirdhand end of a friend whose ear caught fire while machine. Everything is dangerous all it’s not yet been pulled off the shelves, under investigation — so there. "but can you tell me which hour or? The you had quite a few of them." led me. "Well . . . reddish."

a’s house late the following afternoon, near the flowerpot, and let myself in through the back door. A lengthy note on the coffee table explained how I might go about operating everything from the television to the waffle iron, each carefully detailed procedure ending with the line “Remember to turn off and unplug after use.” At the bottom of page three, a postscript informed me that if the appliance in question had no plug — the dishwasher, for instance — I should make sure it had completed its cycle and was cool to the touch before leaving the room. The note reflected a growing hysteria, its subtext shrieking, Oh-my-God-he’s-going-to-be-alone-in-my-house-for-close-to-an-hour. She left her work number, her husband’s work number, and the number of the next-door neighbor, adding that she didn’t know the woman very well, so I probably shouldn’t bother her unless it was an emergency. "P.P.S. She’s a Baptist, so don’t tell her you’re gay.”

The last time I was alone at my sister’s place she was living in a white-brick apartment complex occupied by widows and single, middle-aged working women. This was in the late seventies, when we were supposed to be living in dorms. College hadn’t quite worked out the way she’d expected, and after two years in Virginia she’d returned to Raleigh and taken a job at a wineshop. It was a normal-enough life for a twenty-one-year-old, but being a dropout was not what she had planned for herself. Worse than that, it had not been planned for her. As children we’d been assigned certain roles — leader, bum, troublemaker, slut — titles that effectively told us who we were. As the oldest, smartest, and bossiest, it was naturally assumed that Lisa would shoot to the top of her field, earning a master’s degree in manipulation and eventually taking over a medium-size country. We’d always known her as an authority figure, and while we took a certain joy in watching her fall, it was disorienting to see her with so little confidence. Suddenly she was relying on other people’s opinions, following their advice and withering at the slightest criticism.

_Do you really think so? Really?_ She was putty.

My sister needed patience and understanding, but more often than not, I found myself wanting to shake her. If the oldest wasn’t who she was supposed to be, then what did it mean for the rest of us?

Lisa had been marked Most Likely to Succeed, and so it confused her to be ringing up gallon jugs of hearty burgundy. I had been branded as lazy and irresponsible, so it felt right when I, too, dropped out of college and wound up living back in Raleigh. After being thrown out of my parents’ house, I went to live with Lisa in her white-brick complex. It was a small studio apartment — the adult version of her childhood bedroom — and when I eventually left her with a broken stereo and an unpaid eighty-dollar phone bill, the general consensus was “Well, what did you expect?”

I might reinvent myself to strangers, but to this day, as far as my family is concerned, I’m still the one most likely to set your house on fire. While I accepted my lowered expectations, Lisa fought hard to regain her wineshop was just a temporary setback, after becoming the manager. Photographing people reacting to germs and viruses, when there was very little call for thirty-page essays, she got a real estate license. When told she was down, she returned to school to study, and you looked, if not young, then at least

Step indoors and you automatically put on a 401(k) plan.

My sister’s home didn’t really lend itself to spending my hour in the kitchen, making yet still I found it fascinating. He asked ho tions, Lisa fought hard to regain her former title. The wineshop was just a temporary setback, and she left shortly after becoming the manager. Photography interested her, so she taught herself to use a camera, ultimately landing a job in the photo department of a large international drug company, where she took pictures of germs, viruses, and people reacting to germs and viruses. On weekends, for extra money, she photographed weddings, which really wasn't that much of a stretch. Then she got married herself and quit the drug company in order to earn an English degree. When told there was very little call for thirty-page essays on Jane Austen, she got a real estate license. When told the housing market was down, she returned to school to study plants. Her husband, Bob, got a job in Winston-Salem, and so they moved, buying a new three-story house in a quiet suburban neighborhood. It was strange to think of my sister living in such a grown-up place, and I was relieved to find that neither she nor Bob particularly cared for it. The town was nice enough, but the house itself had a way of aging things. Stand outside and you looked, if not young, then at least relatively carefree. Step indoors and you automatically put on twenty years and a 401(k) plan.
Repeat After Me

My sister’s home didn’t really lend itself to snooping, and so I spent my hour in the kitchen, making small talk with Henry. It was the same conversation we’d had the last time I saw him, yet still I found it fascinating. He asked how I was doing, I said...
I was all right, and then, as if something might have drastically changed within the last few seconds, he asked again.

Of all the elements of my sister's adult life — the house, the husband, the sudden interest in plants — the most unsettling is Henry. Technically he's a blue-fronted Amazon, but to the average layman, he's just a big parrot — the type you might see on the shoulder of a pirate.

"How you doing?" The third time he asked, it sounded as if he really cared. I approached his cage with a detailed answer, and when he lunged for the bars, I screamed like a girl and ran out of the room.

"Henry likes you," my sister said a short while later. She'd just returned from her job at the plant nursery and was sitting at the table, unlacing her sneakers. "See the way he's fanning his tail? He'd never do that for Bob. Would you, Henry?"

Bob had returned from work a few minutes earlier and immediately headed upstairs to spend time with his own bird, a balding green-cheeked conure named José. I'd thought the two pets might enjoy an occasional conversation, but it turns out they can't stand each other.

"Don't even mention José in front of Henry," Lisa whispered. Bob's bird squawked from the upstairs study, and the parrot responded with a series of high, piercing barks. It was a trick he'd picked up from Lisa's border collie, Chessie, and what was disturbing was that he sounded exactly like a dog.
en, as if something might have drastically last few seconds, he asked again.
ts of my sister's adult life — the house, hidden interest in plants — the most unet ically he's a blue-fronted Amazon, but to , he's just a big parrot — the type you 3ulder of a pirate.

The third time he asked, it sounded as approached his cage with a detailed an nged for the bars, I screamed like a girl Dom.

my sister said a short while later. She'd ner job at the plant nursery and was sit ning her sneakers. "See the way he's fan ved from work a few minutes earlier and d upstairs to spend time with his own e-cheeked conure named José. I'd thought enjoy an occasional conversation, but it stand each other.
tion José in front of Henry." Lisa whis awked from the upstairs study, and the ith a series of high, piercing barks. It was up from Lisa's border collie, Chessie, and g was that he sounded exactly like a dog.

Just as, when speaking English, he sounded exactly like Lisa. It was creepy to hear my sister's voice coming from a beak, but I couldn't say it didn't please me.

"Who's hungry?" she asked.

"Who's hungry?" the voice repeated.

I raised my hand, and she offered Henry a peanut. Watching him take it in his claw, his belly sagging almost to the perch, I could understand what someone might see in a parrot. Here was this strange little fatso living in my sister's kitchen, a sympathetic listener turning again and again to ask, "So, really, how are you?"

I'd asked her the same question and she'd said, "Oh, fine. You know." She's afraid to tell me anything important, knowing I'll only turn around and write about it. In my mind, I'm like a friendly junkman, building things from the little pieces of scrap I find here and there, but my family's started to see things differently. Their personal lives are the so-called pieces of scrap I so casually pick up, and they're sick of it. More and more often their stories begin with the line "You have to swear you will never repeat this." I always promise, but it's generally understood that my word means nothing.

I'd come to Winston-Salem to address the students at a local college, and then again to break some news. Sometimes when you're stoned it's fun to sit around and think of who might play you in the movie version of your life. What makes it fun is that no one is actually going to make a movie of your life. Lisa and I no longer got stoned, so it was all the harder to announce that my book had been optioned, meaning that, in fact, someone was going to make a movie of our lives — not a student, but a real director people had actually heard of.

“A what?”

I explained that he was Chinese, and she asked if the movie would be in Chinese.

“No,” I said, “he lives in America. In California. He’s been here since he was a baby.”

“Well,” I said, “he’s got . . . you know, a sensibility.”

“Oh brother,” she said.

I looked to Henry for support, and he growled at me.

“So now we have to be in a movie?” She picked her sneakers off the floor and tossed them into the laundry room.

“Well,” she said, “I can tell you right now that you are not dragging my bird into this.” The movie was to be based on our parrot years, but the moment she put her foot down I started wondering who we might get to play the role of Henry.

“I know what you’re thinking,” she said. “And the answer is no.”

Once, at a dinner party, I met a woman whose parrot had learned to imitate the automatic icemaker on her new refrigerator. “That’s what happens when they’re left alone,” she’d said. It was the most depressing bit of information I’d heard in quite a while, and it stuck with me for weeks. Here was this creature, born to mock its jungle neighbors, and it wound up doing impressions of man-made kitchen applibook had been optioned, meaning that, in ning to make a movie of our lives — not director people had actually heard of.
he was Chinese, and she asked if the hinese.
he lives in America. In California. He’s as a baby."

I

es a sensibility.”

: to be in a movie?” She picked her sneakossed them into the laundry room.

y for support, and he growled at me.

o be in a movie?” She picked her sneak­ d to play the role of Henry. "I

"Was that a good kiss?" she asked. "Did you like that?"

I expected a yes-or-no answer and was disappointed when he responded with the exact same question: "Did you like that?" Yes, parrots can talk, but unfortunately they have no idea what they’re actually saying. When she first got him, Henry spoke the Spanish he’d learned from his captors.
Asked if he’d had a good night’s sleep, he’d say simply, “Hola,” or “Buena.” He goes through phases, favoring an often repeated noise or sentence, and then moving on to something else. When our mother died, Henry learned how to cry.
He and Lisa would set each other off, and the two of them would go on for hours. A few years later, in the midst of a brief academic setback, she trained him to act as her emotional cheerleader. I’d call and hear him in the background, screaming, “We love you, Lisa!” and “You can do it!” This was ances. I repeated the story to Lisa, who told me that neglect had nothing to do with it. She then prepared a cappuccino, setting the stage for Henry’s pitch-perfect imitation of the milk steamer. "He can do the blender, too," she said.

She opened the cage door, and as we sat down to our coffees, Henry glided down onto the table. “Who wants a kiss?”
She stuck out her tongue, and he accepted the tip gingerly between his upper and lower beak. I’d never dream of doing such a thing, not because it’s across-the-board disgusting but because he would have bitten the shit out of me. Though Henry might occasionally fan his tail in my direction, it is understood that he is loyal to only one person, which, I think, is another reason my sister is so fond of him.

"Was that a good kiss?" she asked. "Did you like that?"

Repet After Me
replaced, in time, with the far more practical “Where are my keys?”

After finishing our coffees, Lisa and I drove to Greensboro, where I delivered my scheduled lecture. That is to say, I read stories about my family. After the reading, I answered questions about them, thinking all the while how odd it was that these strangers seemed to know so much about my brother and sisters. In order to sleep at night, I have to remove myself from the equation, pretending that the people I love expressly choose to expose themselves. Amy breaks up with a boyfriend and sends out a press release. Paul regularly discusses his bowel movements on daytime talk shows. I’m not the conduit, but just a poor typist stuck in the middle. It’s a delusion much harder to maintain when a family member is actually in the audience.

The day after the reading, Lisa called in sick and we spent the afternoon running errands. Winston-Salem is a city of plazas — midsize shopping centers, each built around an enormous grocery store. I was looking for cheap cartons of cigarettes, so we drove from plaza to plaza, comparing prices and talking about our sister Gretchen. A year earlier she’d bought a pair of flesh-eating Chinese box turtles with pointed noses and spooky translucent skin. The two of them lived in an outdoor pen and were relatively happy until raccoons dug beneath the wire, chewing the male and the rear legs off her husband.

“I may have the order wrong,” Lisa said, a picture.”

The couple survived the attack and on the live mice that constituted their diet, themselves forward like a pair of half-stripped W. "The sad part is that it took her two with Lisa said. "Two weeks!" She shook her head, their exit. ‘I'm sorry, but I don't know how owner could go that long without noticing. It's just not right.”

According to Gretchen, the turtles had their former limbs, but Lisa wasn't buying it. "They must at least have phantom that happened to Chessie, I honestly don’t lives with myself” Her eyes misted and she the back of her hand. "My little collie gets a Lisa's a person who once witnessed a thing. "I just hope there isn’t a dog in the idea of suffering doesn’t faze her much, but she'll sick-pet story.

"Did you see that movie about the asked. “It played here for a while but I just told me a dog gets killed in the first fifteen forget it.”

I reminded her that the main character coons dug beneath the wire, chewing the front legs off the female and the rear legs off her husband.

"I may have the order wrong," Lisa said. "But you get the picture."

The couple survived the attack and continued to track the live mice that constituted their diet, propelling themselves forward like a pair of half-stripped Volkswagens.

"The sad part is that it took her two weeks to notice it," Lisa said. "Two weeks!" She shook her head and drove past our exit. "I'm sorry, but I don't know how a responsible pet owner could go that long without noticing a thing like that. It's just not right."

According to Gretchen, the turtles had no memories of their former limbs, but Lisa wasn't buying it. "Oh, come on," she said. "They must at least have phantom pains. I mean, how can a living creature not mind losing its legs? If anything like that happened to Chessie, I honestly don't know how I could live with myself." Her eyes misted and she wiped them with the back of her hand. "My little collie gets a tick and I go crazy."

Lisa's a person who once witnessed a car accident, saying, "I just hope there isn't a dog in the backseat." Human suffering doesn't faze her much, but she'll cry for days over a sick-pet story.

"Did you see that movie about the Cuban guy?" she asked. "It played here for a while but I wouldn't go. Someone told me a dog gets killed in the first fifteen minutes, so I said forget it."

I reminded her that the main character died as well, hor-ribly, of AIDS, and she pulled into the parking lot, saying, "Well, I just hope it wasn't a real dog."

I wound up buying cigarettes at Tobacco USA, a discount store with the name of a theme park. Lisa had officially quit smoking ten years earlier and might have taken it up again were it not for Chessie, who, according to the vet, was predisposed to lung ailments. "I don't want to give her secondhand emphysema, but I sure wouldn't mind taking some of this weight off. Tell me the truth, do I look fat to you?"

"Not at all."

She turned sideways and examined herself in the front window of Tobacco USA. "You're lying."

"Well, isn't that what you want me to say?"

"Yes," she said. "But I want you to really mean it."

But I had meant it. It wasn't the weight I noticed so much as the clothing she wore to cover it up. The loose, baggy pants and oversize shirts falling halfway to her knees: This was the look she'd adopted a few months earlier, after she and her husband had gone to the mountains to visit Bob's parents. Lisa had been sitting beside the fire, and when she scooted her chair toward the center of the room, her father-in-law said, "What's the matter, Lisa? Getting too fat — I mean hot. Getting too hot?"

He tried to cover his mistake, but it was too late. The word had already been seared into my sister's brain.

"Will I have to be fat in the movie?" she asked.

"Of course not," I said. "You'll be just like I am according to who?"

"Like I am according to who?" she asked.

"Well, not all of them," I said. "Just one."

Normally, if at home during a weekday, I'd sit in the living room, reading nineteenth-century novels, breaking at one o'clock to watch a television program called Matlock on PBS. But today, I finished with my errands, the day's broccoli, and so we decided to go to the movies. Lisa chose the story of a young Eagle to remain happy while trying to lose weight, but in the end she got her plaza. We arrived at the wrong theater just in time for Count on Me, the Kenneth Lonergan movie about a roving brother visits his older sister. Norman, who talks from one end of the picture to the other will spread mayonnaise onto a chicken salad. She'll lean over, whispering, "One time, I tried to make a sandwich. This movie reflected our lives so exactly in recent memory, she was stunned. There was no physical resemblance between us, but like us, they'd stumbled to adulthood, confining roles assigned to them as children.
“Of course not,” I said. “You’ll be just ... like you are.”
“Like I am according to who?” she asked. “The Chinese?”
“Well, not all of them,” I said. “Just one.”

Normally, if at home during a weekday, Lisa likes to read nineteenth-century novels, breaking at one to eat lunch and watch a television program called Matlock. By the time we finished with my errands, the day’s broadcast had already ended, and so we decided to go to the movies — whatever she wanted. She chose the story of a young Englishwoman struggling to remain happy while trying to lose a few extra pounds, but in the end she got her plazas confused, and we arrived at the wrong theater just in time to watch You Can Count on Me, the Kenneth Lonergan movie in which an errant brother visits his older sister. Normally, Lisa’s the type who talks from one end of the picture to the other. A character will spread mayonnaise onto a chicken sandwich and she’ll lean over, whispering, “One time, I was doing that? And the knife fell into the toilet.” Then she’ll settle back in her seat and I’ll spend the next ten minutes wondering why on earth someone would make a chicken sandwich in the bathroom. This movie reflected our lives so eerily that for the first time in recent memory, she was stunned into silence. There was no physical resemblance between us and the main characters — the brother and sister were younger and orphaned — but like us, they’d stumbled to adulthood playing the worn, confining roles assigned to them as children. Every now and then one of them would break free, but for the most part they behaved not as they wanted to but as they were expected to. In brief, a guy shows up at his sister’s house and stays for a few weeks until she kicks him out. She’s not evil about it, but having him around forces her to think about things she’d rather not, which is essentially what family members do, at least the family members my sister and I know.

On leaving the theater, we shared a long, uncomfortable silence. Between the movie we’d just seen and the movie about to be made, we both felt awkward and self-conscious, as if we were auditioning for the roles of ourselves. I started in with some benign bit of gossip I’d heard concerning the man who’d played the part of the brother but stopped after the first few sentences, saying that, on second thought, it wasn’t very interesting. She couldn’t think of anything, either, and so we said nothing, each of us imagining a bored audience shifting in their seats.

We stopped for gas on the way home and were parking in front of her house when she turned to relate what I’ve come to think of as the quintessential Lisa story. “One time,” she said, “one time I was out driving?” The incident began with a quick trip to the grocery store and ended, unexpectedly, with a wounded animal stuffed into a pillowcase and held to the tailpipe of her car. Like most of my sister’s stories, it provoked a startling mental picture, capturing a moment in time when one’s actions seem both unimaginably cruel and completely natural. Details were carefully chosen and the pace built gradually, punctuated by a series of well-timed pauses.

"And then . . . and then . . .” She reached elusion and just as I started to laugh, she pounded the steering wheel and fell apart. It wasn’t tears you might release when recalling an event, but the violent explosion that comes when all such events are connected, forming a web of guilt and suffering.

I instinctively reached for the notebook in my pocket and she grabbed my hand to stop me. I couldn’t think of anything, either, and so we said nothing, each of us imagining a bored audience shifting in their seats.

In the movie version of our lives, I would offer her comfort, reminding her, conviction she’d described had been kind and just. She’s incapable of acting otherwise.

In the real version of our lives, my instinct would simply be to change her mind. “Oh, come on, really funny, and, I mean, it’s not like you’re going to do anything with it.”

Your life, your privacy, your occasional circumstance is all you’re going to do anything with it. Is this the brother I was, or the brother I have become?

I’d worried that, in making the movie, they’d get me and my family wrong, but now it occurred to me: What if he got us right?

Dusk. The camera pans an unrelenting street, moving in on a parked four-door car. From the street corner, a small, evil man turns to his sobbing sister and says, “I use the story but say that it happened to..."
would break free, but for the most part they wanted to but as they were expected to. She was at his sister's house and stays for he kicks him out. She's not evil about it, and forces her to think about things she'd essentially what family members do, at members my sister and I know.

theater, we shared a long, uncomfortable movie we'd just seen and the movie we both felt awkward and self-conscious, ioning for the roles of ourselves. I started a bit of gossip I'd heard concerning the part of the brother but stopped after nces, saying that, on second thought, it ting. She couldn't think of anything, ei- d nothing, each of us imagining a bored in their seats.

gas on the way home and were parking in when she turned to relate what I've come quintessential Lisa story. "One time," she as out driving?" The incident began with a perry store and ended, unexpectedly, with stuffed into a pillowcase and held to the, Like most of my sister's stories, it proential picture, capturing a moment in time seem both unimaginably cruel and com-tails were carefully chosen and the paceaktuated by a series of well-timed pauses.

"And then . . . and then . . . " She reached the inevitable conclusion and just as I started to laugh, she put her head against the steering wheel and fell apart. It wasn't the gentle flow of tears you might release when recalling an isolated action or event, but the violent explosion that comes when you realize that all such events are connected, forming an endless chain of guilt and suffering.

I instinctively reached for the notebook I keep in my pocket and she grabbed my hand to stop me. "If you ever," she said, "ever repeat that story, I will never talk to you again."

In the movie version of our lives, I would have turned to offer her comfort, reminding her, convincing her that the action she'd described had been kind and just. Because it was.

She's incapable of acting otherwise.

In the real version of our lives, my immediate goal was simply to change her mind. "Oh, come on," I said. "The story's really funny, and, I mean, it's not like you're going to do anything with it."

Your life, your privacy, your occasional sorrow — it's not like you're going to do anything with it. Is this the brother I always was, or the brother I have become?

I'd worried that, in making the movie, the director might get me and my family wrong, but now a worse thought octurred to me: What if he got us right?

Dusk. The camera pans an unremarkable suburban street, moving in on a parked four-door automobile, where a small, evil man turns to his sobbing sister, saying, "What if I use the story but say that it happened to a friend?"
But maybe that’s not the end. Maybe before the credits roll, we see this same man getting out of bed in the middle of the night, walking past his sister’s room, and continuing downstairs into the kitchen. A switch is thrown, and we notice, in the far corner of the room, a large standing birdcage covered with a tablecloth. He approaches it carefully and removes the cloth, waking a blue-fronted Amazon parrot, its eyes glowing red in the sudden light. Through everything that’s gone before this moment, we understand that the man has something important to say. From his own mouth the words are meaningless, and so he pulls up a chair. The clock reads three A.M., then four, then five, as he sits before the brilliant bird, repeating slowly and clearly the words “Forgive me. Forgive me. Forgive me.”